Percentiles Compared to Clinical OCD Sample

Scoring and Interpretation Information

For comprehensive information on the TAFS-R, see here.

Raw scores and percentiles for the three subscales are given as output, with higher scores indicating a stronger tendency toward thought-action-fusion like cognitions. For each subscale, percentiles based on a student and clinical sample are computed using Safron et al., (1996) original validation samples. A percentile of 50 for the OCD clinical sample represents the average amount of TAF thoughts that a person with OCD experiences, while a percentile of 50 on the student sample indicates the average TAF thoughts that a relatively healthy individual experiences. Percentiles are not computed for the total score. The three subscales are as follows:

1. TAF-Moral (items: 1, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 11, 13, 15, 17, 18, 19): The belief that having an unacceptable thought is the moral equivalent of carrying out the unacceptable or disturbing action.
2. TAF-Likelihood Other (items: 2, 5, 7, 9): The belief that thinking an unacceptable thought about another person increases the likelihood of that thing happening.
3. TAF-Likelihood Self (items: 12, 14, 16): The belief that thinking an unacceptable thought about ourselves makes it more likely to occur.

On first administration, the subscale percentiles are presented compared to the clinical OCD sample with a shaded colour in the background for the higher percentiles (indicating more Thought-Action-Fusion). On subsequent administrations the subscale percentiles are presented over time to indicate change as a result of treatment.

Client Responses
